1702 Kicks Off Second Year: Bringing Silicon Valley's Entrepreneurial Ecosystem to Mobile

After a successful inaugural class in 2015, 1702 began its second class of networking, counseling and training among a group of Mobile area CEOs and business leaders. Designed to foster a thriving entrepreneurial community similar to that in Silicon Valley, this year's class of 19 executives will spend the next eight months in this program learning from various subject matter experts.

Class presenters will share their success stories and lessons learned on topics critical to launching, scaling and exiting a company. These include: corporate formation structures, legal and risk, raising venture capital, driving revenue, building a board, recruiting and retaining top talent, and successful exit strategies.

1702, formed in partnership with the Mobile Area Chamber of Commerce, is a combined vision of Michael Chambers with University of South Alabama and entrepreneur Dean Parker. Its mission is to stimulate collaboration on critical aspects of growing a business, drive innovation along the Gulf Coast, strengthen networks and take companies to the next level of greatness. A local board will serve as class mentors and work with participants on implementing business start-up best practices.

"1702 has been a smashing success and I am excited for this year's class," said Parker, 1702 board chair. "We added an additional industry sector to this year's program – healthcare, and now have five areas from which we pull nominees." Other areas are technology, manufacturing, aerospace and consumer sectors

"As we move into our second year in this program, it's exciting we have another large, diverse class of entrepreneurs. Our region's entrepreneur ecosystem continues to grow, and this large class size shows it," said Bill Sisson, president and CEO of the Mobile Area Chamber. "We saw by the cross-section of industry sectors these participants represent, innovation is taking place in all of the Chamber's industry recruiting sectors."

Class participants are working directly with an active board of business executives, all committed to supporting this year's class of 1702.
